CLUB-MATE

The goal is to create a unique space
for people to make
collaborate in
and outdoors.
this year
is the 11th edition.

many participants
focus on sound &
devices that make them unique they are here. There are near constant sessions sharing music, field recordings, and noises harvested from the Susa valley, together
participants redefine
what it means
to produce
sound work
play is highly encouraged

there's also a focus on sustainability.

PIFcamp works hard to minimize waste by carefully sorting, weighing and tracking all waste.

PIF began as a funded project through a grant, some years have maintained having funding but some years have not.

the organizers love the program too much to let funding stop it from running the event is driven by the participants, bringing an unconference style where attendees run talks, workshops, listening sessions, and more by adding a piece of tape with details to the larger schedule board. In the past there was a greater focus on mentorship but now it's more about skillsharing

PIF is the kind of place that will change your mindset if you let it. After 11 years of sessions a lot has changed both with the event and in the valley it runs, yet, the core remains the same. People make a project. they document the project. they share it with each other and the world.

Camp concludes

with an open Saturday

week participants work on their pieces with this day in mind across the weeks three spaces transform into showcases

for their work. the public is invited to come

join and see what's

been created here

there's excitement

& sadness as it

all comes to a

PIF will be back in some form again.
